disease (AD) is an effect of episodic impairment. In a longitudinal study, persons with probable AD (n = 32) and normal older adults (n = 33) were assessed at baseline and 1 and 2 years later. A distinguishing feature of the study was that items encoded at 1 year were presented with false-memories cues in initial testing, but all other items were presented with true-memories cues in the second testing session. Based on these cues, the subjects

judged whether or not they had already been presented with a
given item.

Relative to control
participants,
subjects with AD
were impaired on
the first but not
the second
testing. With the exception of items that were presented with false memories, amnestic change was evident for those items tested with true memories.

Findings indicate that episodic changes in AD do not depend on the nature of forgetting or decay processes but on the availability of memory during presentation of

encoding
episodes.E-book
